We used no gravel for wrecking the work, but in what was above low water, the interstices were filled by hand, after set with small sharp rubble stones of the same kind; and it is to be further noted, that the outside blocks, after being roughly squared, were not laid upon their beds, but set with their angles upwards, so that every stone was jambed between two, set in a similar manner below. I am therefore of opinion that the method proposed will be sufficient to resist the violence of the sea, when got up to its full height, and covered with an entire platform of large blocks upon the top. In regard to the economy that may attend this mode of operation, I must observe, that in all the piers above mentioned the whole or by far the greatest part of all the stones employed were not found by the sea shore, but by necessity brought from quarries by land carriage, so that the expense upon the whole was not less than four shillings per ton; and would have been far greater, had nothing but large blocks been employed. It may therefore in some situations be better economy to make use of the stones that are there, there, if large, though rounding, and to fill all solid, than either to break them to render them angular, or fetch this kind of stones from quarries within land. It seems...
