As to the enclosing walls, being not for support, they may be placed as boss at its centre. When the span of the. the architect pleases, either at the outer or inner edge of the buttresses. The one method, being that adopted by the French architects, gave to their interiors those deep recesses, whilst the other, or English method, served only to produce external play of light and shade. The Norman buttress resembles a flat pilaster, being a mass of masonry with a broad face, slightly projecting from the wall. They are, generally, of but one stage, rising no higher than the cornice, under which they often, but not always, finish with a slope. Sometimes they are carried up to, and terminate in, the corbel table. Fig. 1, Plate LVII. represents a buttress in two stages, with simple slopes as set-offs; this example is somewhat narrower and projects more than the Norman buttress. Fig. 2 is a buttress of the Early English style, having a plain triangular or pedimental head. The angles were sometimes chamfered oil, and sometimes ornamented with slender shafts. In buttresses of different stages, the triangular head or gable is used as a finish for the intermediate stages. In the Decorated style, the outer surfaces of the buttresses are ornamented with niches, as in fig. 3. In the Perpendicular style, the outer surface is often partially or wholly covered with panel-work tracery (fig. 4). It has been said...
