Excerpt: . . . of his cello. --Continued in our next. As long as his mother was alive, ean Vignol, who was a model of filial devotion, had found enough to live for. But during the two years since he had been left alone, with no relatives, few friends, and the habits of a recluse, he found life in his lofty quarters very dull. He was now a man of forty-seven, with the beginnings of a corporation, a big black beard, a Socratic nose, kindly eyes, and just a topknot of hair on a head that was otherwise quite bald. As his health was not good and his stomach only second-rate, he had even had to give up the consolations of tobacco. Never had the commonplace characters in his tales, the kid-gloved assassins, the virtuous working girls, abused and abandoned by low, cowardly aristocrats, the generous young engineers who, on leaving school, succeed in their work to the extent of obtaining the most honorable decorations and the hand of the young person so often in the course of the story menaced with the most terrible calamities, ---never, I say, had all the puppets of his melodramatic show seemed more tiresome to him. The poor chap was actually beginning to hate his means of livelihood. The deuce! said he to himself one Christmas eve, as he slowly toiled up to the fifth floor, for he was beginning to be a little asthmatic, the deuce! The editor now finds that...
